Research Expertise:

My research specialisation is the contemporary art and visual culture that addresses war, terror and political violence.

Explanation of Outputs within my Discipline

Scholarly Outputs: In art history and theory, as in other academic disciplines, esteem particularly amongst the academic community is indicated by the publication of scholarly books, book chapters, peer-reviewed journal article and conference papers. In the discipline of art history and theory, scholarly publications are characterised thus:

- Single-authored: almost all books, chapters and refereed articles are authored by one researcher, leading to fewer outputs overall.
- 5,000 – 7,000 words: peer-reviewed journal articles and book chapters are normally in this range, requiring considerable work by one author.
- Single researcher grants: while research teams are common on external funded grants, internal grants tend to be awarded to a single researcher.

Industry Outputs: Unlike many other university disciplines, art historians and theorists are expected to publish in industry magazines and other types of publications that are deemed to be 'non-traditional research outputs' (NTRs) in other disciplines. Generally speaking, these are not creative works, but rather works of scholarship and criticism that are commissioned by magazine editors and publishers, as well as organisations from the museums and galleries sector. In the discipline of art history and theory, industry publications are characterised by:

- Larger readership: while books, chapters and refereed articles have esteem in the academic context, the vast majority of professionals in the museums and galleries sector read industry magazines. My Industry outputs include significant Australian magazines such as Artlink and Art Monthly, and international magazines such as Artforum, which is to art criticism what being published in Vogue may be to a fashion critic.
- Feature articles and Catalogue essays of 3,000 – 5,000 words: magazine feature articles are normally in this range, requiring considerable work by one author. Industry expectations are that these works be scholarly in style and fully referenced in the same way as a peer reviewed journal. Exhibition reviews can be as short as 500 words, and as long as 2,000 words.
- Exhibitions: art historians and theorists are often involved in collaborative projects where they contribute directly as curators, authors and even artistic collaborators.

Community Engagement: The museums and galleries sector is an emphatically public-facing industry, with a strong emphasis on community engagement. Success is measured in the extent of public outreach, whether that is attendance figures for curated exhibitions, or for public lectures and talks, or viewer numbers of videos on social media. In the discipline of art history and theory, public and community engagement is characterised by:

- Explanatory purpose: unlike scholarly and industry outputs, whose audience is specialised, much community engagement of art history and theory is explanatory, aimed at increasing understanding amongst the uninitiated general public.
- Broad audiences: audiences of museums and galleries vary from specialists, to interested member of the public, to infrequent visitors with no specific interest in the arts.
